

Opening combat jobs to women raises registration questions

Associated Press

U.S. leaders repeatedly insist that the all-volunteer force is working and the nation is not returning to the draft. But there are increasing rumblings about whether women should now be required to register if they can indeed serve in all areas of the military. READ MORE

Lawmakers move to abolish the draft

Military Times

As Congress begins debate on whether to force women to register for the draft, a bipartisan group of House lawmakers has a compromise solution: Get rid of it altogether. "Maintaining the Selective Service simply makes no sense," said Rep. Mike Coffman (R-Colo.), a Marine Corps veteran. READ MORE

Studying military families: Joy of reunion challenged by reality of everyday life

Killeen Daily Herald

Deployment is a way of life for many military families. Psychologists and communication experts have studied it, and say the challenges of deployments don't stop with homecoming. Getting back to a new sense of normalcy is just one of many factors that comes with how deployments can impact married relationships in the military, an issue increasingly being studied by research firms and universities. Millennials: Understanding this generation and the military

The Association of the United States Army

Millennials are a wartime generation but unlike the silent generation (born mid-1920s through early 1940s) of World War II and the baby boom generation (born 1946 through 1964) of Vietnam, millennials have been bombarded with information about the dangers and messy realities of warfare and its aftermath.
